About Museums Changes Live Campaign
What Guides Us?

• Mission: Inspiring Museums to Change Lives

• Vision: Inclusive, participatory and sustainable museums at the heart of their communities

• Values: Inclusivity, diversity and equality
“Many museums have taken this on board and are undertaking work streams which aim to positively impact audiences and communities. With increasing financial pressure however, museums need to understand the importance of socially engaged practice and how it relates to their purpose; measure the impact of their work; and articulate it effectively.

Measuring social impact is not always easy, impact can be far reaching and can continue to be felt months or even years after project completion. It can be challenging to find the right approach as social impact is not simple to quantify and therefore qualitative measures such as interviews and testimonies of participants are frequently used.” – Museum Association
With core budgets tightening museums are increasingly dependent on shorter-term project work to help them achieve social value and undertake socially engaged practice. It is therefore important to be mindful that project work should fit into the organisational strategy and therefore contribute towards long-term goals. Many organisations will have a Theory of Change in place to define their commitment to providing social value. These are the long-term aims of an organisation and project work should be designed to work towards achieving these.

Theory of Change

- Individual Empowerment: A community of people developing MoH, Training opportunities and other prospects, Improved skills, life chances and learning.
- Institutional Influence: Research & partnerships, Publications & campaigns, Better access and more informed policy.
- Public Awareness & Education: Public engagement, Workshops, events and exchanges, Better understandings about homelessness.

Museum of Homelessness (MoH) Theory of Change
Setting Outputs and Outcomes

MA toolkit excerpt:

“Outcomes are the backbone of your work. They define the positive changes or improvements your project is designed to work towards. These outcomes set what it is you will be measuring when looking at the social value of your work. Sometimes outcomes are bigger than one project and your activities will only partially contribute to it.

This is fine, and longer-term thinking can add to a project’s value and indeed the strength of the organization overall. The outputs are the activities you will undertake to achieve your outcomes and can be used to set your evaluation framework.”
• Getting and overview of your outputs and objective

• Testing whether the resources and activities are enough to achieve your outputs

• Set aims and objectives in context of:
  x Short-term outputs (evident during lifetime of the project)
  x Medium-term outcomes (measurable in evaluation)
  x Long-term outcomes (is seen more as a key driver, than a measurable)

• Identify assumptions that could pertain to the project, what will people need to keep an eye on?

• Monitor changes to overall project, periodically updating the logical model.
Logical Model

Methods For Measuring Social Impact

Once you have your outputs and outcomes set you can begin to think about how you will measure against them. In order to do this effectively it is important to build a robust approach that is tailored to your particular project using a selection of the tools, detailed in this section. However, it is also useful to think about what you don’t need to measure so you are concentrating your resources on measuring what is useful.

You will also need to consider whether evaluation needs to be undertaken in-house or by an external evaluator, so your budget can reflect this. In-house evaluation is sometimes assumed to be the cheaper option, and external evaluation as being more robust; neither of which is necessarily true. Evaluation Support Scotland has produced a useful guide if you are going down the route of external evaluation that can help you ensure you get the most from this process. See the further reading section for the guide.

Before choosing an approach, you should first consider if there is an existing approach being used by local partners that can be adapted. This can have the benefit of aiding the sharing of information across different sectors.
Methods of Measuring Social Impact
Creative Methods

Quantitative data – is useful to compare past work to what you are doing now, building a picture or where you are as an organisation.
- Closed Questions
- Personal data
- Range statements
- Visual aids

Qualitative information – this give your quantitative a boost, it elevates the numbers and data graphics when reporting, it allows for deeper understanding to who you have been building a relationship with.
You can carry out this approach with the following:
- Interviews and questionnaires
- Participant Observations and testimonials
- Environment of where this will take place
